The treatment has been as far as possible geometrical, and, with the exception of the formulae of plane and spherical trigonometry necessary for the solution of triangles, very little analysis has been introduced into the main discussion. Seeing that good figures are important aids to the understanding of the geometrical relations of crystals, and that practice in drawing crystals develops the student's power of solving crystallographic problems, I have throughout given prominence to the methods used in making diagrams. The principles of projection followed in the construction of such figures are therefore explained at an early stage. About the...
