Pursuant to a congressional request, GAO reviewed the Department of Defense's (DOD) personal property disposal process, focusing on: (1) the way the disposal process works; (2) DOD's rate of return when it sells this property and the private sector's rate of return on certain sales; and (3) the best business practices and innovative techniques DOD is using or considering for use in disposing of unwanted personal property. GAO noted that: (1) the DOD disposal process, which is governed by numerous laws and regulations, starts when DOD activities turn in items to the Defense Reutilization and Marketing Offices (DRMO) for disposal; (2) upon receipt, DRMO personnel inspect the items for condition, acquisition value, and special handling requirements such as those for pilferable or militarily sensitive items; (3) items are accumulated for 14 to 28 days and then processed together; (4) the Defense Reutilization and Marketing Services (DRMS) disposition priorities are to reutilize property within DOD, transfer items to other federal agencies and organizations with equivalent priority for the purpose of obtaining excess property, and donate the remaining items to eligible entities such as state and local governments, among many others; (5) items that remain after these priorities have been served are sold to the general public or disposed of, primarily through service contracts; (6) DRMS overall rate of return on the reported acquisition value of all usable property it sold in fiscal year 1996 was 1.97 percent; (7) when compared with the private sector's rate of return for similar items, DRMS rates are low; (8) there are many reasons for DRMS lower rate of return; (9) for example, many of the aircraft parts it disposes of only have military application, and...
